stage (steɪdʒ), sb. Also 6 north. stayge, Sc. staige; pl. stagies. [ad. OF. estage masc. (mod.F. étage) = Pr. estatge (also estatga fem.), It. staggio station, dwelling (obs.), support for a net, side of a ladder, etc.:—popular L. staticum*, f. L. stāre to stand (OF. ester, Prov. estar). From the etymological meaning standing, station, standing place, were developed in OF. many special senses, which passed into ME.; the only senses that have survived into mod.Fr. are 'story of a building' (= 1 a) and certain fig. applications of this. Mod.F. stage, the 'terms' to be kept before admission to certain professions, is ad. med.L. stagium, ad. OF. estage. In OF. estage was taken as the etymological equivalent of L. stadium, and used to render that word as denoting an ancient measure of distance (hence sense 7 below). Branch IV represents an English development of meaning, which seems to have begun about 1600, and for which it is not easy precisely to account. It may in some degree have been influenced by the notion of an etymological connexion of the word with L. stadium; at any rate this notion is distinctly traceable in the medical use 11 b.]

stager ('steɪdʒə(r)). [f. STAGE sb. + -ER¹.

It is not wholly impossible that in the expression old stager (sense 1 below) the word may be ad. OF. estagier an inhabitant, resident (f. estage STAGE sb.), or med.L. stagiārius (see STAGIARY¹) which is used in English monastic records (e.g. Cust. St. Augustine's, Canterbury, Henry Bradshaw Soc. Publ. XXIII) for an aged monk who was lodged permanently in the infirmary. Derivation from STAGE sb. is, however, more probable, but the precise notion seems difficult to determine. The usual explanation that the theatrical stage is alluded to ('one who has been long on the stage of life') finds no support in the 16th and 17th c. examples; the primary sense may be that indicated in the definition of sense 2, but this is supported only by a single quotation.]

4. A staggered arrangement or disposition; spec. in Aeronaut., an arrangement of the wings of a biplane such that the leading edge of the upper wing is in front of or behind that of the lower wing.

1915 W. E. DOMMETT Aeroplanes & Airships 104 When the wings of a biplane are set with the upper one slightly ahead of, or abaft of the other, they are said to be staggered. The stagger is measured by the angle made by the line joining the leading edges with the normal to the fore and aft axis of the aeroplane. It is convenient to call the stagger positive if the upper wing is ahead of the lower. 1919 H. SHAW Text-Bk. Aeronaut. iii. 58 The effect of positive stagger on a biplane is to cause the lower plane to work in a slight downdraught from the upper plane, and so decreases its angle of incidence, giving the machine greater stability. 1937 Times 13 Nov. 13/5 All the footmarks lay on the same straight line with no 'stagger' right or left of it. 1950 R. The vb. in Fr. and in the other Rom. langs. has only its etymological sense 'to remove the dye from', intr. 'to lose colour, fade, be washed out'. Some of the Eng. senses, both of stain and distain, are difficult to account for; it is possible that in AF. the prefix des- in desteindre may sometimes have been taken in the sense 'diversely, differently'; it is also possible that the verb of Fr. origin may have coalesced with an adoption of ON. steina to paint, f. stein-n paint, prob. identical with steinn stone.]

†stainand, a. Her. Obs. Also 6 staynand, 7 staynant, 7, 9 stainant. [app. a pres. pple. of STAIN v. (either northern ME. or repr. OF. desteignant).] An epithet of certain colours.

The precise sense and correct application are very doubtful, most of the successive writers having apparently copied from their predecessors with little understanding. The Book of St. Albans (quot. 1486 s.v. STAINING ppl. a.) seems to use 'steining colowre' for any tincture (whether 'colour' or 'metal') which presents a uniform tint in contradistinction to spots, etc.; according to this authority the 'steining' colours are the only ones that may appear on the shield of a gentleman. On the other hand, according to Legh (1562), 'staynande' colours are those which may not be used in armory; tawny or tenné, being the 'surest' of all the mixed colours, is the only one of them that is not 'staynande'; we may perhaps hence infer that Legh took the adj. to mean 'fugitive' (cf. STAIN v. 2), or rather 'indeterminate'. Guillim (1610) says that some heralds disallow the use of tawny and murrey (or sanguine) for fields, regarding them as 'staynande' (Ferne in 1586 speaks of these two as 'stains', not colours), but it is not clear how he interpreted the adj. The later notion that staynand means 'disgraceful', designating tinctures that are used for the purpose of 'abatement', appears to be entirely unfounded.

1562 LEGH Armory 19 Tawney,.. blazed by thys woorde, Tenne. It is a worshipfull colour... But very fewe Englishe men beare the same. Yet it is armorye, and so are all coloures, that are not staynandes. Ibid. 19 b, Tenne.. is the surest colour.. beeyng componed. For it is made of two bryghte coloures, whiche is Redde, and Yellowe. And ye shall not haue any colour so made emongest all yt may be deuysed, and not to be staynande. 1610 GUILLIM Heraldry I. iii. 11 [Copies Legh and continues thus:—] The last of the seuen mixed colours, we doe commonly call Murrey, but in Blazon, Sanguine, and is (as most truly saith Leigh) a Princely Colour, being indeed one of the colors appertaining of ancient time to the Prince of Wales... Some Heralds of approued iudgement doe hardly admit these two last mentioned for Colours of Fields, in regard they are reckoned Staynand Colours. 1658 PHILLIPS, Stainand-colours, in Heraldry are tawney and murrey. 1673 A. WALKER Leez Lachrym. 25 Though a rough Herald would have found blots enough in Abner's Scutcheon, and a rude Pencil would have painted it with staynant Colours, or a Scotch Coal. 1689 SMITHURST Britain's Glory 167 Tenne, Orange Colour; a Colour Stainant. 1845 LOWER *Curios. 1. a. An ascending series or 'flight' of steps leading from one level to another, esp. from one floor to another in a house; a staircase.

Still the ordinary use in Scotland, where 'up the stair', 'down the stair' are the usual equivalents for upstairs, downstairs, and '(to go up) six stairs' means what in England would be expressed by 'six flights of stairs'. (The whole series of steps between two successive floors counts, however, as a single 'stair', even when it consists of two or more 'flights' or portions separated by a landing.) In England the sing. in this sense is now very rare, exc. in phr. on the stair, which is itself slightly archaic.

stake (steik), sb.[2] [Of uncertain etymology.

Perh. f. STAKE v.[3] On the alternative supposition that the sb. is the source of the vb., the former may be the same word as STAKE sb.[1] The peculiar use might have been developed from the phrase on the stake, which may originally have referred to a custom of placing on a 'stake' or post the object (an article of clothing or the like) hazarded on the event of a game or contest. There is, however, no evidence of the existence of such a custom; and in our quots. the first example of the phrase is dated 1592, while the use of the sb. to denote the money risked on a game of dice is more than half a century older.]

1. a. That which is placed at hazard; esp. a sum of money or other valuable commodity deposited or guaranteed, to be taken by the winner of a game, race, contest, etc.

stale (steɪl), sb.^{3} [Prob. a. AF. estale, estal (only in Bozon, 13th c.), applied to a pigeon used to entice a hawk into the net; that this word is not an adoption from English is rendered probable by the occurrence of the extended form estalon in continental Fr. with the same sense (Cotgrave 1611; Godefroy gives earlier instances spelt estolon, etelon). Of Teut. origin; cf. OE. stælhrán decoy reindeer, stællo (Northumbrian) catching (of fish), prob. from the root of steall place (STALL sb.^{1}) stęllan to place; for the sense cf. the rendering of stale by 'stacionaria' in the Promptorium, and G. stellvogel decoy-bird.

It has been usual to regard the stæl- in stælhrán as identical with the combining form of stalu theft (as in stælgiest predatory guest, stælhere plundering army); but the difference of meaning renders this unlikely; and the current identification of ONorthumb. stællo with stalu seems inadmissible on grounds both of form and sense.]

stalemate ('steɪlmeɪt), sb. Chess. [f. STALE sb.[6] + MATE sb.[1]

Strictly a misnomer, as the 'stale' (so called until 18th c.) is not really a mate.]

A position in which the player whose turn it is to move has no allowable move open to him, but has not his king in check.

According to modern rules, the game which ends in stalemate is drawn. In England from the 17th c. to the beginning of the 19th c. the player who received stalemate won the game. Various other rules have been in vogue at different times; sometimes the player giving stalemate won, either wholly or to the extent of half the stake; sometimes the last few moves had to be played over again until a mate resulted; sometimes the piece causing the obstruction was removed.

1765 LAMBE Hist. Chess 91 When the King has no man whom he can play, and is not in check, yet is so blocked up, that he cannot move without going into check, this position is called a stale-mate, or Pat, in this case the King who is stale-mated wins the game. 1847 STAUNTON Chess-Player's Handbk. 33 He places the adverse King in the position.. of stalemate.

A parallel formation from the same base is OE. stęmpan to bray in a mortar (occurring only once; cf. á-stęmpan to stamp with a die, stęmping-ísern stamping-iron) = MLG. stempen, WFris. stimpe, NFris. stemp, MHG., mod.G. (? obs.) stempfen:—OTeut. type stampjan*; cf. MLG., mod.G. stempel, MHG. stempfel stamp, die. The Teut. stamp-* is the source of the Com. Rom. verb represented by It. stampare to tread, press, print, Pr., Sp., Pg. estampar to stamp, print, OF. estamper (mod.F. estamper, in some technical senses étamper) to stamp; whence the verbal noun It. stampa press, printing-press, Sp., Pg. estampa, F. estampe engraving, estampe, étampe stamp, die.

The view stated above seems on the whole more likely than the alternative supposition that the verb did not exist in OE., but is solely an adoption of OF. estamper (see above). At the same time there can be little doubt that the sense-development of the Eng. verb has been influenced by the uses of its Fr. cognate.

The Teut. root stamp-* is prob. a nasalized form of stap-* to tread; if so the primary sense of the verb would seem to be that of branch II below, from which the other senses might easily be derived. Some scholars regard the root (pre-Teut. stomb-*) as cogn. w. Gr. στέμβ-ειν ? to shake, ? to maltreat (occurring only once); radical connexion with STUMP sb. has also been suggested.]

stand (stænd), v. Forms: see below. [A Com. Teut. strong verb, in most of the Teut. langs. more or less defective, certain parts being supplied by a synonymous defective verb from the same ultimate root (see below). The OE. standan (stǫndan), pa. t. stód, stódon, pa. pple. ȝestanden, corresponds to OFris. stônda, pa. t. pl. stôdon, pa. pple. stenden; OS. standan, pa. t. stôd (stuod), stôdun (stuodun), pa. pple. -standan; MLG. imp. stant, pa. t. stôt, stôden, also nasalized stunt, stunden (mod.LG. pa. t. stund, stunden); MDu. standen, pa. t. stond, stonden, Flem. stoet, stoeden, pa. pple. †gestanden (mod.Du. pa. t. stond, stonden); OHG. stantan, pa. t. stuont, pl. stuondum, -stuotun, pa. pple. -stantan (MHG. inf. rare standen, pa. t. stuont, pa. pple. gestanden; mod.G. imp. †stand, pa. t. stand, pl. standen, earlier †stund(e etc., pl. †stunden etc., pa. pple. gestanden); ON. standa, pa. t. stóþ, pl. stóþom, pa. pple. staþenn (Norw. standa, pa. t. stod, pa. pple. stadet, stande etc.; MSw. standa, pa. t. stóþ, pl. stóþo, pa. pple. standin, also staþin; mod.Sw. pa. t. stod, pl. stodo, pa. pple. ståndet; Da. †stande, stonde, pa. t. stod, pl. stode, pa. pple. †standet); Goth. standan, pa. t. stōþ, pl. stōþum (pa. pple. unrecorded).

In OTeut. the forms of the verb were probably as follows: pres.-stem stand-, perfect sing. stōþ-, plural stōd-; formed, with suffix -nd- (:—pre-Teut. -nt-) in the present-stem, and -þ-, đ (:—pre-Teut. -t-) in the perfect stem, on the root sta-*: stō-:—Indogermanic st(h)ə-*: st(h)ā-, found in all branches of the family exc. Armenian and Albanian with the senses 'to stand', 'to cause to stand': cf. Skr. sthā (pres. ind. tiṣṭhati, inf. sthātum), Avestic hištaiti, Gr. ἱστάναι, L. stāre, sistĕre, Lith. stojů-s I set myself, OSl. stojati, stati, OIrish táu, tó I am (:—OCeltic stāō*).

In Ger. and Du. the n of the present stem has within historical times passed into the pa. t. The pa. pple., which this vb. prob. did not possess in OTeut., has been variously supplied in the different langs.: the type stadono-*, which conforms to the general rule of the a, ō conjugation, is represented in ON., Norw., MSw.; the other Teut. langs., so far as they do not take their pa. pple. from the shorter form of the verb (see below) have a formation based on the present stem, as in OE. (ȝe)standen. In English the regular form of the pa. pple., standen (with the variants stande, etc.) continued until the 16th c., when its place was taken by stood from the pa. t. A few examples of a weak form standed occur in writings of the 16th c.; in compounds (understanded, withstanded) this formation was less rare, and survived into the 17th c.

In all the Teut. langs. exc. English, Gothic, and Old Norse, the present stem has a shorter form, the OTeut. type of which varies between stai-* and stǣ-* (WGer. stā-); in some of the langs. this is used exclusively, and in others along with the longer form stand-. In some of the languages the earlier form of pa. pple. has been wholly or partially superseded by a new formation from the shorter present stem. The dialectal range of the shorter type will appear from the following list of typical forms (minor variations being omitted): OS. inf. stân (rare; MLG. inf. stân, pa. pple. gestân; mod.LG. inf. staan, pa. pple. staan), OLow Frankish inf. stân (MDu. inf. staen, 3 pres. ind. staet, steet, pa. pple. gestaen; mod.Du. inf. staan, pa. pple. gestaan); OFris. inf. stân, stên, 3 pres. ind. steet, pa. pple. stên (WFris. inf., 1 pres. ind. stean); OHG. inf. stân, stên (MHG. inf. stân, stên, mod.G. stehen, stehn); MSw. inf. stâ (mod.Sw. stå, pa. pple. wk. ståd); Da. inf. staa, pa. pple. staaet; Norw. inf. staa, pres. staar, stær.

The remarkable parallel between the verbal stems stǣ-*, stai-, stand- and gæ-*, gai-, gang- (see GO, GANG vbs.) strongly suggests that one of the two series has been assimilated to the other. The relation between the two, however, and the precise mode of formation of the shorter verbal stems from the roots, is very uncertain. For an outline of the different views, with references, see Deutsches Wb. ('Grimm') X. II. 1433.]

standard ('stændəd), sb. (a.) Also 4–6 standarde, 4–5 stondard, 4–6 standerde, 4–7 standerd, (6 standred), 4–7, 8 rare standart, 5–6 standert (5 estandert, 6 standertt), stondart(e (5 stondert), 6 stander, 7 Sc. stender. See also ESTANDARD. [aphetic a. OF. estandard, -art, -estendard, -art (mod.F. étendard) = med.L. standardum, -us, standarium, etc. Pr. estandard, -art, Sp., Pg. estandarte, It. stendardo; according to most scholars f. com. Rom. estend-ere (L. extend-ĕre to stretch out: see EXTEND v.) + -ARD; a parallel synonymous formation with different suffix is It. stendale, late OF. estandale, -deille (med.L. standale, -ālis). The Fr. word has passed into all the living Teut. langs.: MHG. stanthart (by popular etymology, as if 'stand hard'), later standart, standert (mod.G. standarte), MDu. standaert (mod.Du. standaard, standerd), Da. standart, Sw. standar.

The origin of sense 9 ('standard of measure or weight'), whence the other senses in branch II are derived, is somewhat obscure. It appears in AF. (estaundart) and Anglo-L. (standardus) in the 13th c., two centuries earlier than our earliest vernacular instance. It has not been found in continental OF.; the use of Du. standaard in this sense is believed to be imitated from English. It is noteworthy that in early instances the standard of measure is always either expressly or by implication called 'the king's standard', an expression which belongs to the older sense 1. It seems probable that sense 9 is a fig. use of sense 1; the king's standard being the point of reunion of the army, and the centre from which commands are issued.

The senses grouped as branch III are of doubtful, probably of various and in some instances of mixed origin. The notion of 'something conspicuously erected', involved in sense 1, would account for several of them; others may be referred to the idea of 'something permanent, fixed, or stationary', generalized from sense 9. Etymological association with STAND v. has, however, certainly affected the whole group, and it is possible that in some uses the word should be regarded as an alteration of STANDER. The senses of this branch are almost confined to English: OF. has estandart some kind of torch (rare$^{-1}$), and WFlem. has standaart mill-post (De Bo; standaert, Kilian); but the relation of these to the English uses is obscure.]

A. sb. I. A military or naval ensign.

1. a. A flag, sculptured figure, or other conspicuous object, raised on a pole to indicate the rallying-point of an army (or fleet), or of one of its component portions; the distinctive ensign of a king, great noble, or commander, or of a nation or city.

†standard-general: the principal standard of an army.

In Eng. the word appears first with reference to the 'Battle of the Standard' in 1138. A contemporary writer, Richard of Hexham, relating the story of the battle, describes the 'standard' there used as a mast of a ship, with flags at the top, mounted in the middle of a machine which was brought into the field. He quotes a Latin couplet written on the occasion, which says that the standard was so called from 'stand', because 'it was there that valour took its stand to conquer or die'.

2. a. In a more restricted sense, a military or naval flag of some particular kind.

Ordinarily, the standard is understood to be distinguished from a banner by being long and tapering instead of square, and from a pennon by its greater breadth. The British royal standard, however, which is flown when the king or a member of the royal family is present, is now a square flag (thus technically a 'banner'), divided into four compartments bearing the emblems of England (twice), Scotland, and Ireland. In the British army, the regimental flags of the cavalry are called stondords, those of the infantry being 'colours'. In the U.S. army the flag of a cavalry regiment is called its stondord.

b. to ride the stang: to be mounted astride of a pole borne on the shoulders of two men, and carried through the streets for the derision of the spectators.

In some places in Scotland and the north of England, one who has in certain ways incurred the indignation of his or her fellow-villagers is compelled to 'ride the stang' (either personally, in effigy, or by proxy), accompanied by a jeering crowd and sometimes 'rough music'. There is also a New Year's day custom by which every one met by the mob has either to 'ride the stang' or pay a forfeit.

The corrupt form stallion (quot. 1601 in 1 a) may have had dialectal currency; cf. the converse mispronunciation staniel for stallion, which is common in rustic speech. The spurious forms standgale, -gall, given in some recent dictionaries, are evolved from the etymologizing conjecture 'stand-in-gale' (Swainson, Prov. Names of Birds). The alleged Ger. synonym steingall, commonly cited by etymologists as cognate, is of doubtful genuineness. The 19th c. lexicographers seem to have obtained it, directly or indirectly, from the Vocabula of Peucer and Eber (1549). But although in this glossary the word is treated as German, its source appears to be William Turner's Avium Historia (Cologne 1544), where steingall is said to be the English word for tinnunculus. Turner's steingall prob. represents steingall*; Gesner (1555) says that it is northern English. The English ornithologists of the 17th c., following Gesner, give steingall as an English name of the bird; Willughby's stone-gall is an etymologizing alteration of this.]

The kestrel, Tinnunculus alaudarius. Also applied contemptuously to a person, in allusion to the uselessness of the kestrel for the purposes of falconry. (Cf. KESTREL b.)

Stanton ('stæntən). [Name of Sir Thomas Edward Stanton (1865–1931), English engineer.] Stanton number, a dimensionless measure of heat transfer used in forced convection studies, equivalent to the ratio of the Nusselt number to the product of the Reynolds and Prandtl numbers, viz. $h/c_p\rho u$, where h is the heat transfer coefficient of the fluid, c_p is its heat capacity at constant pressure, ρ is its density, and u is its velocity.

Defined as the reciprocal of the Prandtl number in some dictionaries, but no textual evidence for this has been found.

1942 W. H. MCADAMS Heat Transmission (ed. 2) iv. 95 Stanton number. 1966 W. M. KAYS Convective Heat & Mass Transfer xi. 248 The decrease in Stanton number noted here occurs in what still seems to be essentially a turbulent boundary layer. 1978 *Internat. Jrnl. ‖stapes ('steɪpi:z). [mod.L. use of med.L. stapēs (staped-) stirrup. Cf. It. stapede (sense 1).

In the 16th c. stapes was regarded as the standard Latin word for stirrup (for which there was no word in classical Latin, as stirrups were not used by the ancients); it is in Estienne, Cooper, and two Latin-Ger. dictionaries cited by Diefenbach. Du Cange has one example of stapes, and one each of stapedium (1314), stapeda, and strapes. The word may perh. be an alteration of med.L. stapha, staffa (= It. staffa stirrup), after L. stāre to stand and ped-em, pēs foot.]

1. The innermost of the three ossicles in the tympanum of the ear in mammals; named from its stirrup-like shape.

The Sicilian anatomist J. Ph. Ingrassia (died 1580), in his posthumous notes to Galen De Ossibus (1603), claims the discovery of this bone, and says that he called it stapha, but others, more solicitous about Latinity, preferred stapes or strapeda. In 1564 Eustachius (De Auditus Organis, Opusc. Anat. 153) asserts that he made the discovery before Ingrassia did, and states that some call the ossicle staffa or stapes.

The (M)LG., (M)Du. stapel, and hence the G. and Sw. stapel, Da. stabel, have the sense 'emporium, mart', in addition to the senses mentioned under the preceding sb. It is, however, uncertain whether this sense was developed in MLG., or whether it originated in OF., and was thence adopted into MLG. The precise relation of this sense to the other senses of the Teut. word is also uncertain. It has been usually held to have been developed from the sense 'heap, pile'. This is not impossible; but, on the other hand, in the Frankish laws regis stapulus meant the place where the king or his representative administered judgement; the original notion may have been that of 'raised platform'. The transition would be easy from the Frankish sense of regis stapulus to that of the 'king's staple' for the collection of duties on merchandise.]

1. a. A town or place, appointed by royal authority, in which was a body of merchants having the exclusive right of purchase of certain classes of goods destined for export; also, the body of merchants so privileged. Now only Hist.

The English word has not been found earlier than 1423; the AF. estaple and the Anglo-L. stapula, however, occur in statutes and official documents from the reign of Edw. II onwards, and these contain evidence that the institution of the staple was of older date. Each staple had a mayor and constables, appointed by the king, and in early times distinct from the municipal authorities, though latterly the mayor of some boroughs was ex officio mayor of the staple. At various times the chief staple was oversea, usually at Bruges or Calais; from about 1390 to 1558 it was at Calais, which is often called 'The Staple'. There were also staples in many important towns of England, Wales, and Ireland, the list of which varied greatly at different periods. Statute of the Staple: the ordinance 27 Edw. III (1353), which established staples in various English towns, and at Carmarthen, Dublin, Waterford, Cork, and Drogheda, and contained regulations for their form of government and the conduct of their business. 2. a. (More fully Court of Star-chamber.) A court, chiefly of criminal jurisdiction, developed in the 15th c. from the judicial sittings of the King's Council in the Star Chamber at Westminster. The judges were the Lord Chancellor or Lord Keeper, the Lord Treasurer, the Lord Privy Seal, and any peers that chose to attend. The rules of procedure of the court rendered it a powerful instrument in the hands of a sovereign or a ministry desirous of using it for purposes of tyranny, and the abuse of it under James I and Charles I have made it a proverbial type of an arbitrary and oppressive tribunal. It was abolished by an Act of the Long Parliament in 1641.

start (stɑ:t), v. Pa. t. and pa. pple. started. Forms: (? 1 north. pr. pple. sturtende), 3–6 sterte, 3 -storte, (3 3rd sing. pres. start, stard), 4–6 styrt, 4–7 stirt(e, (5 3rd sing. pres. stirt), 4–7 sturt(e, stert, starte, 6 Sc. stairt, 4– start. Pa. t. 3–5 sturte, stirt(e, 3 storte, 3–6 sterte, 4–5 sturt, 4–6 stert, 4–7 start(e, styrte, 6 stertt, styrtt, steart; 5 stirted, 6 sterted, 6– started. Pa. pple. 4 stirt, styrt, 4–6 stert(e, 5 stirte, 6–7 start; 6– started. [App. two formations representing different ablaut-grades of the Teut. root stert-* (: start-: sturt-). The OE. styrtan (only once, in pres. ppl. styrtende, miswritten stvrtende) corresponds formally to (M)LG. störten, (M)Du. storten, WFris. stoarte, NFris. stört, OHG. sturzen (MHG., mod.G. stürzen), MSw. styrta, störta, (mod.Sw. störta, Da. styrte):—OTeut. sturtjan*. The verb in continental Teut. has the senses: To overthrow, precipitate, overturn; to empty by overturning, to pour out; also intr. to rush, to fall headlong, to gush out. (The mod.Fris. forms are certainly from Du. and LG.; the word may possibly be native in Scandinavian, but the senses in Sw. and Da. are largely adopted from Ger.)

The ME. sterte (whence mod.Eng. start) is, so far as it is a southern form, explicable as the Kentish representative of OE. styrtan, whence in other ME. dialects sturte, stirte, etc. But the occurrence of sterte in early northern English, and of its normal phonetic descendants in mod.Sc. and northern dialects, points to the existence of a form (? OE. steortian*, ? stiertan*) corresponding to MHG. sterzen (also starzen) trans. and intr. to set up (or stand) stiffly, to move briskly.

Other derivatives of the root are START sb.[1] (f. stert-*), OE. steartlian (f. start-*) to stumble: see STARTLE v. No cognates outside Teut. are known.]

starvation (stɑː'veɪʃən). [f. STARVE v. + -ATION. Except flirtation (1718), this is the oldest of the many sbs. in -ation formed on native Eng. vbs.

App. first used with reference to the bill of 1775 'for restraining Trade and Commerce with the New England Colonies', which the Opposition denounced as intended to combat the rebellion by producing a famine in which the innocent would suffer equally with the guilty. The remark of Mr. Dundas (Hansard's Deb., 6 Mar. 1775), that he was 'afraid' that the famine spoken of 'would not be produced by this Act', excited great indignation, and in 1781–2 Walpole and Mason call him by the nicknames 'Starvation Dundas' and 'Starvation'. The statement of Mitford (Corr. Walpole & Mason, 1851, II. 396) that Dundas himself used the word is in itself not improbable, but appears to lack confirmation. The verb starve occurs several times in the reports of speeches on the bill, but the sb. does not appear.]

[A Com. WGer. str. verb, which has become weak in mod.Eng.: OE. steorfan (pa. t. stearf, pl. sturfon, pa. pple. storfen) corresponds to OFris. sterva (WFris. stjerre, NFris. sterwe), OS. sterban, (M)LG., (M)Du. sterven, OHG. sterban (MHG., mod.G. sterben), to die, f. Teut. root sterƀ-* (:—starƀ- :—sturƀ-).

A root of identical form, and possibly of identical origin, occurs in ON. stiarfe wk. masc., ? epilepsy, stiarf-r, stir-finn obstinate, starf toil, effort, starfa to toil. It has been suggested that the primitive sense of the root may have been 'to be rigid', which might account both for the sense 'to die' of the WGer. verb and for the meanings of the ON. words. On the other hand, as the Teut. form may equally well represent pre-Teut. sterp-* and sterbh-*, it is possible that the WGer. and the ON. words may be unconnected.

The conjugation of the verb has remained strong in the continental Teut. langs. In English the strong forms of the pa. t. became obsolete in the 15th century, and those of the pa. pple. in the 16th c. The transitive (causative) use, which arose in English in the 16th c., is not paralleled in the other langs.]

stasipatric (stæsɪ'pætrɪk), a. Biol. [f. Gr. στάσις STASIS + πάτρα fatherland (f. πατήρ father) + -IC.] Applied to a form of speciation in which new taxa are considered to arise within the geographical range of the parent species, each part of which comes to be occupied by one of the new taxa. Hence stasi'patrically adv.

1967 M. J. D. WHITE et al. in Austral. Jrnl. Zool. XV. 298 If a term, equivalent to allopatric and sympatric, is needed to describe the process of direct conversion of an essentially continuous population into a number of contiguous taxa (races, semispecies, or species) by the spread of chromosomal rearrangements around which isolating mechanisms develop, one might perhaps choose the adjective stasipatric, which is intended to indicate the essentially unchanging geographic range of the superspecies. 1968 Science 8 Mar. 1069/1 In the case of a chromosomal rearrangement which first establishes itself near the edge of a species distribution, one can imagine it spreading both inwards through the range of the species (stasipatrically) and outwards into previously unoccupied territory (allopatrically). 1973 L. S. DILLON Evolution x. 138/2 The stasipatric model is not designed to displace the established ones but to supplement them.

stasis ('stæsɪs, 'steɪsɪs). [mod.L., a. Gr. στάσις, standing, station, stoppage, f. στα- to stand.]

1. a. Path. A stagnation or stoppage of the circulation of any of the fluids of the body, esp. of the blood in some part of the blood-vessels.

1745 R. JAMES Med. Dict. III, Stasis,..a Stagnation. 1753 Chambers' Cycl. Suppl., Stasis, a word used by physicians to express a stagnation of the humors. 1835–6 *Todd's Cycl. BARLOW in Times 7 Aug. 8/2 A strong case has been made out for intestinal stasis as a cause of various forms of malnutrition.

b. gen. Inactivity; stagnation; a state of motionless or unchanging equilibrium.

1920 Glasgow Herald 30 Nov. 9 The prevailing mood of Labour is indefinite; a condition of stasis has been caused by the coal strike and the dread of unemployment. 1930 W. EMPSON Seven Types of Ambiguity vii. 245 He is drawn taut between the two similar impulses into the stasis of appreciation. 1933 T. S. ELIOT Use of Poetry & Use of Criticism vi. 103 Arnold represents a period of stasis; of relative and precarious stability, it is true, a brief halt in the endless march of humanity in some, or in any direction. 1940 E. MUIR Story & Fable v. 186 This could be done by so controlling the chemical processes of the body as to produce a self-subsistent balance, an everlasting, living stasis. 1943 Sewanee Review LI. This prefix is an abbreviation for abstat which was proposed for electrostatic units at the same time as ab was suggested for electromagnetic units.

-stat, the terminal element in certain names of scientific instruments, aerostat, heliostat, hydrostat, klinostat, thermostat. The earliest example of this formation is heliostat, ad. mod.L. hēliostata ('s Gravesande a 1742), app. repr. an assumed Gr. type ἡλιοστάτης* (cf. ὑδροστάτης hydrostatic balance), intended to mean an instrument for causing the sun to appear stationary, f. ἥλιο-ς sun + -στατης agent-n. f. στα- root of ἱστάναι to cause to stand, set. This word is directly imitated in siderostat (hybrid, f. L. sīder- star). The F. aérostat (whence Eng. aerostat) may be a back-formation from aérostatique (formed after hydrostatique), but owes its form to the example of héliostat. The later words have been formed on the analogy of heliostat, app. with some reference to the Gr. στατός standing, stationary, which is given in Fr. and Eng. dicts. as the source of the ending.

statable ('steɪtəb(ə)l), a. Also stateable. [f. STATE v. + -ABLE.] Capable of being stated.

4. a. Physical condition as regards internal make or constitution, molecular form or structure, and the like. Also, one of several forms or conditions in which an object—animal, vegetable, or mineral—is found to exist; a phase or stage of existence. Also in generalized or abstract sense: each of the possible modes of existence of a system; the condition of a device that determines what output it produces for a given input.
